Research Shows Stored In Apples Bins Keep Better

Some useful information on the storage of apples has resulted from research at Ditton Laboratory (Larkfield, Maidstone, Kent, England). Experience has shown that bins containing apples should be rigid. If there is a tendency for the sides to "whip" during handling, then the apples inside will be bruised. Materials which offer a smooth continuous surface, such as weather resistant plywood or hardboard (made of compressed wood fibre) of outdoor quality, are better than sawn timber, which may warp and damage the fruit. It has also been found that if bruising is to be reduced to a minimum, then apples should not be stored deeper than 21 inches (53 centimetres) in the bin

As far as ventilation is concerned, experiments at Ditton Laboratory and elsewher suggest that in a store with air circulating from ceiling to floor, slots will give a satisfactory speed of cooling if there is adequate refrigerating capacity; and will maintain a reasonably picking and one receiving; both hands picking at once; and both hands picking alternatively— it was found that the fourth method was most productive and gave the best picking performance, largely because it required less concentration than the the next best method, which with both hands picking at once. It was found, however, that when fruit pickers used one hand only, the other remaining idle, they reached only 40 per cent of their potential output and, when the second hand wes used for receiving the fruit. only 50 per cent. of their potential output.

Experience at the Institute has shown that the most effective containers are those slung on a shoulder harness and held in front of the body. They should be large enough to hold between 26 and 28 founds (11.8 to 12.7 kilograms) of fruit.

It has also been found that a greater weight of fruit is picked in the same time from smaller trees, not only because there is less ladder work, but also because smaller trees tend to give biggger individual apples. But as height increases, production falls until with a tree 24 feet (7.3 metres) high some 30 per cent of the fruit picker's total
