INTERGENERATIONAL STUDIES IN HIGHER EDUCATION:

AN INITIAL SURVEY (1999)

During the last decade, intergenerational studies has begun to attract an increasing number of academics in a variety of academic fields. Similarly, students in increasing numbers are contacting departments in higher education, including intergenerational units such as Generations Together to inquire about courses and training opportunities. Additionally, human service professionals are demonstrating interest in acquiring the knowledge and competencies necessary to effectively administer intergenerational programs as well as earn academic credit for these new professional skills. Evidence of their interest is the number of online inquiries regarding intergenerational training and educational opportunities.

In response to this interest, academic institutions are developing programs that focus on intergenerational content. Programs include intergenerational courses, modules within other courses, certificate programs, service-learning options, independent study, and research projects. Knowledge of these developments in intergenerational studies is, at present, limited to the informal exchange of information among colleagues. A survey of universities, therefore, was conducted by Generations Together in an effort to make this information more widely available to faculty, researchers, and students interested in intergenerational education.

Fifty surveys were sent to colleges and universities, to individual researchers, and to members of AGHE who were engaged in intergenerational activities. Approximately thirty responses were received to the initial survey and to follow-up inquiries. This survey resulted in a unique compilation of information on Intergenerational Studies courses, modules, and certificate programs available at the college/university level.

The identification of Intergenerational Studies in formal courses, modules, or in faculty research interests has been difficult at this stage in the discipline's development. This survey is the beginning of the process to collect and to disseminate information on intergenerational studies in higher education. Additions and corrections are welcomed. (See below for information.)

Subsequent editions of this list will include new information as Generations Together continues to act as a clearinghouse for information on intergenerational studies in higher education. A copy of the original questionnaire is attached to this survey.

Thank you to all the individuals who provided information on their programs and research and to AGHE for assisting in the distribution of the questionnaire.
