2008. 368p. Viking, $25.95 (9780670018666).

This is an ambitious and unusual project, a novel that limits itself to documented moments of Robert Frost's life, including actual dialogue and excerpts from poems and letters. Unconcerned with linear progression and invested in all of Frost's life, from childhood to old age, Hall slices the poet's experiences into more than 100 small chapters of varying points of view. The cumulative effect is impressionistic, if dizzying, and some stories burn brighter. Frost's friendship with an aspiring poet is rendered with surprising depth and tenderness, but Frost's relationship with his five children proves too complex for the novel's structure, which never lingers long on any individual. Frost's unlikely meeting with Khrushchev receives the most attention, though it is Frost's famously intimate understanding of nature that Hall conveys most lucidly: "You were looking west, and the sun was always going down, and each range was mistier, vaguer than the one in front of it. It looked as if the ranges, one by one, were going to sleep, turning to dream." —Kevin Cloutier
