Impending Second Chinese Test Hostens Efforts To Reach Non-Proliferation Pact
WASHINGTON, Feb. 18 (AP) - Both the US and China are working to avoid a nuclear arms race as the Chinese Premier said the US should not try to "win" a test ban on nuclear weapons.

The Chinese Premier, Mr. Li Zhaoxing, said in a statement that the US should not try to "win" a test ban on nuclear weapons. He called for a non-proliferation pact to be reached by the end of the year.

Mr. Li said that the US should work with China to ensure that the test ban is not a "zero-sum game" and that both sides should be willing to make concessions.

He also called for a "mutually beneficial" approach to the test ban negotiations, with both sides willing to make concessions and work towards a mutual understanding.

Mr. Li's statement came after a meeting with US Secretary of State, Madeleine Albright, where they discussed the prospects for a non-proliferation pact.

The meeting took place on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, and was described as "productive" by both sides.

Mr. Li's statement suggests that China is willing to work towards a non-proliferation pact, but that it will not be a "zero-sum game" and that both sides should be willing to make concessions.

Mr. Li's statement also suggests that China is willing to work towards a mutually beneficial approach to the test ban negotiations, with both sides willing to make concessions and work towards a mutual understanding.

Mr. Li's statement is significant because it shows that China is willing to work towards a non-proliferation pact, and that it is willing to make concessions in order to achieve this goal.

The US has also been working towards a non-proliferation pact, and has been encouraging other countries to join in the negotiations.
