LIQUIDITY AND GOLD STANDARD

The recent period of gold for investment and speculation was from the mid-1930s to the early 1950s. It was based on the gold standard, which had been in place from 1870 to 1914. During this period, the value of gold was fixed at $35 per ounce, which helped to stabilize the international currency system.

However, the gold standard had its problems, including the drain on gold reserves, which led to the adoption of the Bretton Woods system in 1944. Under this system, countries fixed their currencies to gold at a rate of $35 per ounce, but they were allowed to adjust their exchange rates within a narrow band.

The Bretton Woods system was in place from 1944 to 1971, when it was dismantled due to the strains of the Vietnam War and the rise of inflation. Since then, the international monetary system has been based on a floating exchange rate system, which has led to greater volatility in currency values.

To maintain the value of their currency, countries have had to adopt measures such as monetary policy, fiscal policy, and capital controls. These measures have been aimed at managing the price of their currency and controlling inflation, which has been a major challenge for many countries around the world. The global financial crisis of 2008 highlighted the need for greater cooperation and regulation in the international monetary system to prevent future crises.
