New Step In Space

In an effort to make the soft landing of Luna-9 on the moon a reality, the Soviet Union has developed a new method for landing spacecraft on the moon. This method, which involves a series of precision maneuvers, is expected to improve the success rate of moon landings and make space exploration more efficient. The landing process is divided into several stages: first, the spacecraft is placed in a stable orbit around the moon; then, it approaches the moon's surface and adjusts its trajectory; finally, it lands softly on the lunar surface. These steps ensure a safe and controlled descent, allowing the spacecraft to land precisely where it is meant to be. This innovation is a significant advancement in space technology, demonstrating the Soviet Union's commitment to exploring the moon and beyond. (Kabul Times, February 10, 1966, Page 2)
