1-22-2018

Monsters and Men

William L. Blizek

University of Nebraska at Omaha, wblizek@unomaha.edu

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://digitalcommons.unomaha.edu/jrf/vol22/iss1/22
Monsters and Men

Abstract
This is a film review of Monsters and Men (2018), directed by Reinaldo Marcus Green.

Keywords
Racism, Police Brutality

Author Notes
William Blizek is the Founding Editor of the Journal of Religion and Film, and is Professor of Philosophy and Religion at the University of Nebraska at Omaha. He is also the editor of the Continuum Companion to Religion and Film (2009).
Monsters and Men (2018), dir. Reinaldo Marcus Green

Monsters and Men has a distinct plot and a specific social commentary. But the movie goes beyond these elements to ask some big questions. What does it mean to be a human being? A man? And what does it mean to be a monster? Something less than human?

The answer is that we are all capable of being both a man and a monster. Expressing our "humanity" does not always mean acting rightly, showing respect for others, expressing love, showing courage. Sometimes it means acting with cruelty, acting out of fear, being selfish, taking our anger out on others, and so on. We are complex creatures. Human beings are like "the force." There is the good side and then there is the dark side. If there were only monsters and only men we would be able to navigate life much more easily. Lock up the monsters and let the men show courage and express love. But since we all have the force within us, since we can all be monsters or men on different occasions, this movie points us in the direction of understanding our real place in the universe.