A year ago the Tory Government introduced the scheme of "levelling up" in which schools were to be divided into four groups, with the top and bottom tiers of schools to be merged. This policy has been widely criticized as being bureaucratic and ineffective.

The Prime Minister's conference in Rome last week, however, has shown that the situation may not be as bad as it seems. A number of educational leaders have met to discuss the problems of the scheme and to consider ways of improving it.

The Prime Minister's conference was held in the context of the recent crisis in education, which has led to a loss of confidence in the government's policies. The crisis has been caused by a combination of factors, including the government's policies on education, the role of the media in public opinion, and the impact of the economic crisis on the education system.

The Prime Minister's conference was an attempt to address these issues and to come up with a new strategy for the future of education. The conference was attended by educational leaders from all over the country, and it was agreed that a number of changes would be made to the scheme of "levelling up" in order to improve its effectiveness.

The conference was also an opportunity to discuss the role of the media in public opinion and to consider ways of improving the relationship between the media and the education system.
