Goodbye Jerome! (2022), dir. Gabrielle Selnet, Adam Sillard, Chloé Farr

This is a film about heaven and what we should or should not expect when we get to heaven. We first meet Jerome at the gates to heaven. Ants are crawling over the gates. The ants will be back. We learn that Jerome is searching for his wife, who died the year before. He encounters various situations—people eating, dancing, grilling hot dogs, and so on—and in each situation he asks the people if they have seen his wife. He describes her differently to each group or person he asks about her, so we learn much about Maryline.

Finally, he meets his deceased wife. He tells her that he wants to pick up where they left off—being together. This is, I think, a common view of heaven—a place where we will once again see our departed loved ones and where we will continue the relationships that we had before their passing.
But it turns out that Marilyn is not interested in “taking up where they left off.” She has started a new life and she enjoys being alone in this new life. She kisses Jerome on the cheek and says goodbye. She then rides off on her bicycle to her thai boxing class.

Jerome is shattered—literally shattered. He jumps off a high railing and falls to the ground where he breaks into many glass shards. The ants return here and carry him underground where they put him back together again.

Jerome then accepts the fact that he is in heaven, but that heaven is not what he had expected. We are asked by the film to consider what we expect heaven to be like and what we will do if heaven is not what we expected.
