The Khyber Pass is the most important border crossing between Afghanistan and the Soviet Union. Its importance is due to the fact that the Khyber Pass is the only natural barrier between the two countries. The Khyber Pass has been strategically important for centuries, and both nations have sought to control it. The Soviet Union sees the Khyber Pass as a strategic asset, while Afghanistan views it as a symbol of its sovereignty and independence. The Khyber Pass is also a key trade route, connecting the countries and facilitating the flow of goods and services.

The Khyber Pass has been the site of numerous military engagements, including the Khyber Pass Campaign of 1878, which was fought between the British and the Afghan forces. The Khyber Pass has also been a symbol of the Afghan identity, with the slogan "Khyber Pass or Death" being used by the Afghan independence movement.

The Khyber Pass is a strategic asset that is important to both countries, and any changes in its control would have significant implications for regional stability and security. However, the control of the Khyber Pass has been a source of contention between Afghanistan and the Soviet Union, and the two nations have been involved in various diplomatic and military engagements over the years.

The Khyber Pass is also a symbol of the Afghan identity, with the slogan "Khyber Pass or Death" being used by the Afghan independence movement.
