Regional Cooperation: No Right To Hamper Flow Of Trade To Land-Locked Countries

The expansion of foreign trade is one of the most important factors in the economic modernization of the less advanced countries. However, the development of this trade is impeded by the need for additional investments in the transportation sector. In the case of Pakistan, the problem is even more acute due to its geographical location. Pakistan is a land-locked country, which means that it lacks direct access to major sea routes. This increases the cost of trade and makes it difficult for Pakistani exports to reach international markets.

Fellows are highlighting the need for Pakistan to become more integrated with other regional trading blocs. For example, Pakistan is a member of the South Asia Free Trade Area (SAFTA), which is a regional trade agreement that aims to promote trade and investment within South Asia.

The fellows argue that Pakistan should also consider joining the Central Asian Free Trade Area (CAFTA), which is a regional trade agreement that covers Central Asia. This would provide Pakistan with access to a larger market and make it easier for Pakistani goods to reach international markets. Pakistan should also consider joining the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC), which is a regional trade agreement that covers the Asia-Pacific region.

The fellows also suggest that Pakistan should focus on improving its infrastructure, particularly its transportation network. This would make it easier for Pakistani goods to reach international markets and make it easier for Pakistani companies to do business abroad.

In conclusion, Pakistan needs to take a number of steps to enhance its trade relationship with other countries. This includes joining regional trade agreements, improving its infrastructure, and promoting exports. Pakistan should also consider joining a number of additional regional trade agreements to enhance its trade relationship with other countries.
