TRANSPORTER TO POWER TO S. RHODESIA URGED

British Policy Attacked In U.N. Assembly

NEW YORK, June 11, (Reuters) - British officials today announced that they would be sending a delegation to the United Nations Assembly to discuss the issue of Southern Rhodesia.

The British delegation, which will be led by Foreign Secretary Michael Heseltine, will be tasked with highlighting the British government's stance on the issue of Southern Rhodesia.

The British government has long been a strong advocate of the principle of self-determination for the people of Southern Rhodesia.

The delegation will be made up of a team of experienced diplomats, who will be tasked with presenting the British case in a clear and concise manner.

The British delegation is expected to arrive in New York later this week, where they will begin their discussions with other members of the United Nations Assembly.

The issue of Southern Rhodesia has been a topic of debate for many years, with the British government arguing in favor of the principle of self-determination, while the Government of Southern Rhodesia has argued in favor of its current form of government.

The British government has been under pressure from other members of the United Nations Assembly to take a stronger stance on the issue of Southern Rhodesia, and the British delegation is expected to play a key role in shaping the debate.

The British delegation is expected to return to the United Kingdom later this week, where they will present their findings to the British government.
