Million-Acre Land Plan

UN'S RESPONSIBILITY

AMSTERDAM, July 17 (Reuters) - The Dutch government has decided to introduce a million-acre land plan in the Netherlands. The plan, which is expected to cost $200 million, will be financed by the government and private sector.

The plan is designed to prevent further urbanization of the Netherlands, which is one of the most densely populated countries in the world. The Dutch government has been under pressure to take action to preserve the country's natural beauty.

The plan will include the construction of 50,000 new houses and the creation of 30,000 new jobs in the countryside. The government has also pledged to increase the number of public parks and nature reserves by 50%.

In addition, the plan will provide for the protection of 100,000 acres of natural areas, including forests, lakes, and rivers. The plan is expected to be completed by 2020.
