U.K.'s Defences Weaker Than Ever Says Wilson
LONDON, Nov. 4 (Reuters)—Mr. Harold Wilson, leader of the Labor Party, yesterday accused the Government of neglecting the defense of the country. Speaking at a Labor Party meeting, Mr. Wilson charged that Mrs. Margaret Thatcher had been misleading the British people about the true state of the nation's defenses. He asserted that the Government's policy was leading to a deterioration in the nation's security, and he urged that the British people should be made aware of the true situation.

Mrs. Thatcher denied the charges, saying that the Labor Party was spreading false information about the country's defenses. She accused Mr. Wilson of trying to create fear and disorder in the nation, and she warned that his policies would lead to the destruction of the country.

The opposition Labour leader went on to say that the government had not invested enough in defense and had neglected the nation's military preparedness. He asserted that the government's cuts in defense spending had put the country at risk of a future war.

Mrs. Thatcher countered by saying that the country's defense had been strengthened under the government's leadership. She asserted that the government had built up the military and increased its capabilities in order to protect the country from any threat.

The debate continued for several hours, with both sides presenting their arguments. The government's emphasis was on the progress made during its time in office, while the opposition highlighted the perceived shortcomings of the government's defense policy.

The debate ended with neither side gaining a clear advantage, as the country awaits the outcome of the general election to be held later this year.
