11 Percent Increase In Soviet Oil Production In 1962

MOSCOW, Dec. 31, (AP).—The Soviet government recently published some western countries with its expanding oil industry, announcing that oil production increased about 100 percent last year.

The official News Agency Tass said that oil production reached about 180 million metric tons, about one million tons more than the previous year.

At the same time, the agency said, the distribution of oil is being made in construction of oil pipeline which would link the oil fields of Europe with oil fields of the Caspian Sea.

The line to it is 3,000 kilometers long.

Tass did not reveal how much has been completed, but said statements have indicated it will be finished during 1963.

One portion of the line comes from the Ukraine to Czechoslovakia, began pumping oil last year. Another branch is to supply East Germany.

The official News Agency Tass also reported that good progress is being made with a pipeline from the fields of Baku to the huge refinery complex near the Ural mountains.

"This line," said Tass, has already gone more than a thousand kilometers. Oil output from the Caspian region last year from Central Asia next year, according to Tass, was 19 million metric tons. The production of natural gas totaled about 75 billion cubic meters during the year just ending. This was annual increase of about 25 percent and about four billion cubic meters above the plan, the agency said.

"In the long term," Tass said, "the oil and gas industries of the Soviet Union will continue to grow at a fast rate. By the second five-year plan" the percent annual increase in oil production is to rise to 20 percent.

Oil prospecting is conducted in the Soviet Union on an enormous scale. "In one single year," according to Tass, "large oil deposits were discovered near the town of Baku, and the prospects of discovering oil in Eastern Siberia, where it had not been found before."
