South African Attack

Against U.N.

Press Review

In a special attack on the U.N. General Assembly, the British government has condemned the U.N. as an "international body of little value." The attack was made by the British government in response to a resolution passed by the U.N. General Assembly.

The resolution, which was passed by 142 countries, called for the United Nations to be reformed and to be made more effective.

The British government has condemned the resolution as a "gimmick" and has said that it will not comply with the resolution.

The attack by the British government has been met with widespread condemnation by other countries, including the United States, which has said that it will not comply with the resolution.

U.S. and British officials have said that they will continue to work with the U.N. to ensure that it is an effective body.

SOUTH AFRICA AND THE RACIAL POLICY

By KRATZ

With South African parliamentarians and in fact the whole color-coded society in South Africa are not expected to be pleased by the recent dispatch of the General Assembly. That is the conclusion one can draw from any reading of the report presented to the General Assembly by the United Nations observer mission in South Africa from its latest mission to the country.

The report was characterized by Mr. Kratzer, the U.N. observer, as "the first substantial report" and as "a document which will be of great importance" to the General Assembly. It is also a document which will be of great importance to the South African government, which has been studying the report for some time.

In his dispatch to the General Assembly, Mr. Kratzer said that the situation in South Africa is "a situation of great concern to the United Nations" and that the government was "very much interested in the report and is ready to study it carefully." He also said that the government was "willing to cooperate with the United Nations in any way that will help to improve the situation in South Africa."
