Macmillan Wins Grudging Majority In Commons After Debate On Profumo's Affair

Wilson Says Premier Gambled With British National Security

LODZ, June 16, (AP).—Sir John Macmillan was given a grudging majority in the Commons yesterday after a debate on Profumo's affair.

The Prime Minister, Mr. David Wilson, had gambled with British national security in his decision to seek a majority on the issue.

The debate on Profumo's affair was a national security issue, and the Prime Minister had to decide whether to allow the affair to continue or to bring it to a close.

Some of his own party were unhappy with the Prime Minister's decision, but he had to make a choice between handing over control to the Commons or allowing the affair to continue.

The debate was adjourned with a majority vote of 32 in favour of the Prime Minister's position.
