KENYA'S INDEPENDENCE NEXT MONTH
KENYATTA EXPECTED TO FACE HARD SITUATION

Prime Minister Jomo Kenyatta will face a difficult challenge when Kenya becomes independent next month. Many political observers here—and even some Kenyan politicians—are concerned whether Kenyatta will be able to maintain his control over the country, or whether civil war may ensue.

The independence of Kenya, which has been under British colonial rule since 1919, is scheduled for December 12. The new country is expected to be a constitutional monarchy with Kenyatta as its monarch.

INCREASED TRADE A CONDITION OF DEVELOPMENT

By R. STOBER

Our total volume of trade, the development of our trade and our wider export markets are all directly dependent upon the development and growth of our trade. Today, as we look at the world's trade and economic trends, we see a strong and growing demand for our products, both in the home market and abroad. This demand is not only for our traditional products, such as textiles, metals, and minerals, but also for our newer and more specialized products, such as chemicals, machinery, and electronics.

The growth of our trade is closely linked to the growth of our manufacturing sector. As our manufacturing base expands, so does our capacity to produce goods for export. This, in turn, leads to increased demand for raw materials and other inputs, which in turn stimulates the development of our industrial sector.

Our trade is also affected by our domestic economic policies. A stable and predictable economic environment, with low inflation and interest rates, tends to encourage trade. On the other hand, economic uncertainty and high levels of taxation can discourage trade.

The development of our trade is also influenced by international factors, such as trade agreements, tariffs, and exchange rates. Our ability to compete on the world market depends on our ability to negotiate favorable trade agreements and to maintain competitive exchange rates.

In conclusion, the development of our trade is a critical factor in the overall development of our economy. By focusing on the growth of our trade, we can ensure a sustained and prosperous economic future.
