Peace Means Settling Disputes By New Methods, Not Elimination Of Conflicts

By MAHMOOD

World peace is indispensable to the development of the world community, and the international community is eager to establish a peaceful and prosperous world. The United Nations, as the world's premier international organization, is working tirelessly to promote peace and security. However, the current international situation is complex and challenging, with conflicts and disputes arising from various sources.

Many factors contribute to conflicts and disputes, including historical grievances, territorial disputes, and economic interests. To address these challenges, new methods and approaches are needed. While the elimination of conflicts is desirable, it is not always possible or practical. Instead, it is more effective to settle disputes through peaceful means, such as negotiation, dialogue, and mediation.

The Darfur, Kashmir, and Basra conflicts are examples of conflicts that could be resolved through peaceful means. The Darfur conflict in Sudan is an ongoing conflict between the government and various rebel groups. The government and rebel groups have engaged in peace talks, and a ceasefire agreement was signed in 2006. However, the conflict remains unresolved, and peace talks continue to be held to find a lasting solution.

The Kashmir conflict between India and Pakistan is another example of a conflict that could be resolved through peaceful means. The two countries have signed a number of agreements to reduce tensions and improve relations, including the 1972 Simla Agreement and the 1999 Tashkent Agreement. While progress has been made, the conflict remains unresolved, and efforts to resolve the conflict continue.

The Basra conflict in Iraq is another example of a conflict that could be resolved through peaceful means. The conflict has been ongoing since the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq War, and while the war officially ended in 1988, the conflict has continued. Efforts to resolve the conflict through peaceful means have been made, including the 1991 Gulf War and the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

In conclusion, while the elimination of conflicts is desirable, it is not always possible or practical. Instead, it is more effective to settle disputes through peaceful means, such as negotiation, dialogue, and mediation. The United Nations and other international organizations continue to work towards a peaceful and prosperous world, and efforts to resolve conflicts through peaceful means remain important.

Population Pressure On Agriculture Faces Asia As Development Decade Progresses

BY INDRA VICTORY

The population explosion in Asia is putting pressure on agriculture and the environment. Asia is the most populous continent, with over 60% of the world's population living there. The growth in population has led to increased demand for food, water, and energy, which has put pressure on the environment.

In addition to population growth, the continent is also facing challenges related to climate change and natural disasters. Extreme weather events, such as floods and droughts, have become more frequent and severe, leading to loss of life and property. Climate change is also affecting the distribution of crops and the availability of water, putting pressure on agriculture.

To address these challenges, Asian countries are implementing policies and initiatives to promote sustainable development. The United Nations' Sustainable Development Goals provide a framework for this, with targets related to poverty reduction, food security, and climate action. However, significant challenges remain, and more needs to be done to ensure that all people have access to food, water, and energy, while also protecting the environment.
