Khatok Gave Pakhtu Much Of Beauty That It Locked

By Pisha I. Shabibi

Khatok was a Pakhtu poet who lived in the 17th century.

Like many a Pakhtu, he was a man of humor and a great opponent of the Khihi, who was the subject of many poems by the Khatok. The Khihi was often criticized for his tyranny and his love for gold.

The Khatok's beauty

was such that it locked him, and he was able to escape from the clutches of the Khihi.

Khotak Gave Pakhu Much Of Beauty That Locked

by Peha A. Shale

In 1511 A.D. in Beni Akbar, a village near Kabul, the king of the Saljuqs, Khotak, gave Pakhu, a young girl, much beauty that locked.

Khotak was a great warrior who ruled over a large area of the region. His kingdom stretched from the Kabul River to the Hindu Kush mountains. Pakhu was one of the nobles in his court.

Khotak had a great admiration for Pakhu's beauty and decided to make her his wife. However, Pakhu was not interested in Khotak and refused to marry him. Khotak realized that Pakhu's beauty and intelligence were more valuable than any other possession.

Khotak gave Pakhu much of beauty that locked. This episode is a great example of the power of beauty and intelligence. Pakhu's beauty and intelligence were what Khotak valued the most.

Johnson Meets S. Vietnamese Pres., Premier in Honolulu

HONOLULU, Feb. 5, 1966 (AP)

South Vietnamese President Ngo Dinh Diem and Premier Nguyen Cao Ky arrived here today for a weekend meeting with U.S. President Lyndon Johnson at Hoi An, the seaside community 50 miles north of Danang.

President Johnson will confer with his Vietnamese guests on the situation in the delta of Quang Ngai, scene of recent fighting.

The talks also will be on the possibility of expanding the area of joint military operations involving the U.S. and the South Vietnamese.

Several problems of security in South Vietnam will be aired, including reports of North Vietnamese military efforts to subvert the Saigon government, the premier and the president said.

President Johnson has previously said he favored a policy of strengthening the Vietnamese government in the face of the Viet Cong threat. He is said to favor a program of strengthening the South Vietnamese government to the extent that it can be practical, with the ultimate goal of a political settlement with the Viet Cong.
