THE RHODESIAN CRISIS

By Frank Datt

Adaptation from "New Africa"

A year on the Tory Government's Southern Rhodesia policy has brought a new element to the situation. It is now becoming clear that the British Premier, Mr. Harold Wilson, is determined to issue a challenge to the white minority government in Southern Rhodesia. This challenge will be in the form of a voluntary declaration of independence by the white minority government, backed up by the Ansean, and Negro leaders, who have been in touch with the British government.

The Prime Minister's campaign is being fought on three fronts. There is the political front, where the British government is attempting to negotiate a settlement. The second front is the economic front, where the British government is attempting to cut off the white minority government's access to the world market. The third front is the military front, where the British government is attempting to secure the proclamation of independence by the white minority government.

The British military forces in Southern Rhodesia have been increased by the addition of a new regiment of the King's Royal Rifle Corps. The regiment was flown into Southern Rhodesia from the United Kingdom to strengthen the British forces in the event of a conflict with the white minority government.

The British policy has been described as "a new approach," by Mr. Wilson. It is designed to help the white minority government to become "a new force," in Southern Rhodesia. The British government has been seeking to negotiate a settlement with the white minority government, but the talks have broken down. The British government is now accepting the principle of "voluntary declaration of independence," as a means of achieving a settlement.
